Basic Hand Anatomy and How it Affects Us

By Keith Filppu

Basic Anatomy:

Each finger is controlled by two sets of tendons; flexor tendons which allow the motion of making a fist, and extensor tendons, which allow extending the fingers outward. The position of the wrist and hand can change the length of the tendons. By dropping the wrist downward the flexor tendons become longer since they stretch over the backhand side of the wrist. By bringing the wrist up the extensor tendons become stretched on the palm side of the wrist.

Near the wrist all of these tendons are held together by the "retinaculum", a super strong sheath. This sheath allows for greater hand strength by combining the individual tendons into a group. But by having all the tendons working together for greater strength it reduces their individual flexibility. Some people may have a smaller or larger "retinaculum", that will affect their flexibility. Having a thicker "retinaculum" or one that extends farther back into the arm will mean decreased flexibility, whereas having one that is thinner and shorter will mean greater flexibility.

The "palmaris longus" is a muscle which helps in flexing the wrist. This structure is vestigial (like the appendix), meaning since we don't need it anymore not everyone is born with this muscle.

How it Affects Us:

Try holding your arm straight out with your wrist straight and your palm facing down. Try flexing and extending your fingers, you should find this rather easy. Now drop your wrist. Try flexing your fingers so that you make a fist, you should find this harder because the flexor tendons are stretched out over the top of the wrist. Now bring your wrist up so that your knuckles come back toward your body. Try extending your fingers all the way, this should be a little more difficult because the extensor

Welcome to the newly revised Washington Guitar Society (WGS) newsletter. I want to first thank Bill Dykes for all his efforts in putting the past issues together and his help in transitioning to the new one. The newsletter is an excellent way for all guitarists and aficionados in the local Washington, DC area to stay attuned to what is going on and where!

With this issue, you will notice some additions and changes as we have redesigned this newsletter. Please take a look at the "Take Note" section that will list upcoming meetings, concerts, and notices. As always, we need your help in keeping not only this newsletter active, but the Society together as well. One way to keep down mailing costs would be for us to send this newsletter out via e-mail. If you would like to sign up to receive our letter this way, please contact me.

I am also soliciting feedback on what members expect from the tendons are stretched out on the palm side of your wrist. Compare those again with just having your wrist straight, you should find that it was much easier to do all necessary finger movements with a straighter wrist. Of course playing with a perfectly straight wrist is nearly impossible, but the closer to it we can be, the easier our fingers can move.

Everyone's hands are different and there is nothing we can do to change what nature gave us. With the size of the "retinaculum" there is a trade-off either way. If it is thicker and longer, then it will be easier to play chords that require a lot of strength, yet harder to move your fingers independently. On the flip side, if it's thinner and shorter there will be greater finger independence, but less overall hand strength.

It may be possible to see if you have the "palmar longus" by simply flexing your hand, and bringing it towards your wrist. If you see a thin muscle going into the center of your palm that bulges out a little bit then you probably have it. Some people may have the "palmar longus" in one arm, in both arms, or neither. If you have it, it will mean that you have slightly more wrist and hand strength than it you don't, but it is not a huge factor in hand strength.

End Notes:

Anatomy of the hand, and the entire body is incredibly complex, and this article only touches on the many aspects that make up hand and finger movements. The hand especially, is one of the most complicated and intricate parts of the body. In the brain the "motor cortex", which is the part of the brain devoted to movement, plays a huge role in hand movements. The majority of this section of the brain is actually devoted to the fine movements of the hands and arms, and to vocalization.

Our anatomy is something we are born with and can't change, the only thing we can do is try to understand what we are given so we can make the best use of it.

 a special thanks to Holly Frost, anatomy professor at NVCC, for all of her help in writing this article

Keith Filppu has been playing classical guitar since age 15 when he picked up his first guitar. He is currently a junior in college and has been enrolled in classes at NVCC and George Mason; he is transferring to James Madison University in the fall, where he will be a performance major. He has spent the last two years studying under Dr. Kevin Vigil. He recently won first place in the annual music competition at NVCC, and has been awarded a scholarship from Fairfax County's Spotlight on the Arts Program. He also teaches at several Music and Arts stores in the area.

GASPAR SANZ – MASTER OF THE BAROQUE GUITAR

by John Patykula

Gaspar Sanz (1640-1710) has been called “the outstanding man of the guitar in seventeenth century Spain.” In spite of this praise, surprisingly little is known about his life. What is known about this great artist and his travels offers insights into his development as a guitarist and composer.

Sanz was born in 1640 to a prosperous family in Calanda in the province of Aragón, a region of Spain that is known for its folk dances. He attended the University of Salamanca where he studied theology, philosophy, and music. He graduated with a Bachelor of Theology degree and later became a Professor of Music there. Sanz traveled to Italy where he studied organ and theory with G. C. Carissimi and guitar with Lelio Colista. For several years, Sanz was organist of the Spanish Viceroy in Naples, a city whose popular dances would later inspire some of his guitar works.

Sanz later traveled to Rome where he became acquainted with the music of the great Italian guitarists Foscari, Granata, and Corbetta, whom he called “the best of all.” Besides the new techniques learned by Sanz in Italy, the popular music of Italy would exert considerable influence on him as a composer.

Sanz returned to Spain and was appointed instructor of guitar to Don Juan, the natural son of King Philip IV and Maria Calderon, a noted actress of the day. It was for Don Juan that Sanz wrote his first book, Instrucción de Música sobre la Guitarra Española, first published in 1674 in Saragossa. A second book entitled Libro Segundo de cifras sobre la guitarra española was printed in Caragoza in 1675. A third book, Libro tercero de música de cifras sobre la guitarra española, was added to the first and second books, and all three were published together under the title of the first book in 1697. It is his masterpiece and, at the same time, his only known contribution to the repertory of the guitar. Yet from these inspired pages, songs and dances of three hundred years ago remain favorites with classical guitarists and audiences alike.

THE MUSIC OF SANZ

Instrucción de Música sobre la Guitarra Española by Gaspar Sanz is a complete instruction book covering all the aspects pertaining to the Baroque guitar. It provides the player with a wide selection of pieces in both punteado (“plucked”) style and rasqueado (“strummed”) style.

This is not a book for the simple strumming of chords—it is a serious contribution by a well-trained virtuoso who desires to impart his knowledge and love of music and the Baroque guitar. Sanz’s book is for those who wish to excel in this art.

The majority of the pieces are dances in the punteado style. The stately Pavanas and Galliardas are reminiscent of sixteenth century Spanish court music and the aristocratic vihuelists. The Españoleta, one of Spain’s most beautiful melodies, is treated in variation form, a form that the Spanish composers excelled in; this haunting melody inspired many Baroque guitarists to compose their own versions. The Canarios, perhaps the most popular of all of Sanz’s works, is a musical portrait of the lively, syncopated dance from the Canary Islands. Other dances like the Villano or “village dance” and Jacaras, inspired by the songs of the ox-cart drivers, offer attractive musical snapshots of Spanish life of that time. Sanz projects a strong nationalistic trait through these selections.

While the Spanish flavor dominates, Sanz’s book also presents a “cosmopolitan” view of musical life in the Baroque era. Baile de Mantua, La Tarantela, and Saltaren are inspired by the music of Italy, while La Minina de Portugal, Zarabanda francesa, and Jiga inglesa musically represent other European countries. And while the popular elements govern the majority of the selections, an explanation of figured bass realization for the Baroque guitar raises the level of musical sophistication of this book over the other tablature books of the time. Sanz even includes a brief section on the rules of fugal writing, demonstrating their use through an actual sketch of a fugue composed specifically for the Baroque guitar. These important aspects suggest that Sanz was writing for a more musically advanced segment of the Baroque guitar population and, perhaps, was encouraging further serious study of all the aspects of the theory of music.

THE MUSIC OF GASPAR SANZ IN THE TWENTIETH CENTURY

The music of the Spanish Baroque guitarists and the sixteenth century vihuelists attracted the attention of the Spanish musicologist Felipe Pedrell (1841-1922). Pedrell was a proponent of the Spanish nationalistic movement and inspired composers like Isaac Albeniz (1860-1909), Enrique Granados (1867-1916), and Manuel de Falla (1876-1946) to write works inspired by the folk music and the great musical heritage of Spain.

For the guitar, the work of Emilio Pujol (1886-1980) is especially noteworthy. His numerous editions of the old masters like Sanz, transcribed for the modern guitar, have been popular for decades. Pujol, who was regarded as an authority on vihuela and Baroque guitar music, followed the principles for transcribing music established in 1909 by the International Congress on Musicology in Vienna. Through his scholarly and artistic work, the music of Sanz became a staple of the modern classical guitar's repertory.

The music of Sanz inspired the great Spanish composer Joaquín Rodrigo (1901-1999) to create a unique work for the repertory of the classical guitar. Rodrigo's Fantasia para un Gentilhombre, composed in 1954 for the Spanish virtuoso Andrés Segovia (1893-1987), is one of the most popular and colorful works for the guitar and orchestra. Through the creative energies of Rodrigo, the music of Sanz was reborn and clothed in modern harmonies.

The Fantasia para un Gentilhombre is one of those rare works which has helped to secure the place of the classical guitar in the concerto repertory of most orchestras.

The music of Gaspar Sanz holds an important place in the history of the guitar. One cannot treat this music with indifference. This music is the inspired work of a true artist—one who “knew well the art and science of composition. His music is beautiful and in it one can feel the nobility of his spirit.”

Reviews

by Bill Dykes

Larry Snitzler performance at The Greenberg Theater

The March 30, 2005 evening offering at the new Greenberg Theater (the old Janus movie theater) presented Larry Snitzler in an evening of classical guitar music that is very demanding of the performer but very accessible to the modern audience. His selections, especially Fantasia-Sonata by Joan Manén, afforded him a chance to show off every trick including flamenco techniques in his well known command of dynamics and tone color. This piece is a reflection of the artistic influences of the modernist school as represented by Joan Miro or Salvador Dali. The music lies somewhere between impressionism and the modernista's radical movement of art into more pronounced manipulation of image and color. The music resembles the art of mosaics and borders the cubist approach. A perfect setting for Mr. Snitzler to convey the feeling of the time as the trend setting era it was. The presentation still brings inspiration as to where music and guitar playing may still go.

In a room that is flat, where there is very little echo or what sound engineers call "slap back," the situation is even more demanding for the player. Such a room can show every note in a stark setting. In modern times, believe it or not, such a situation presents a lot less of a problem if the show is being enhanced by amplification. Acoustic instruments are cantankerous at best with natural elements like humidity or cold. With amplification problems are accented, not hidden. Slap back and other effects are created digitally with fewer ambient sound waves to equalize out. The end result can be a very natural sound with the perfect volume for the listener and the player. If everyone involved knows what they are doing, the performance can attain a natural sound with enough clean volume to bring that sound to each listener.

The player has a different listening situation in this way as well on stage. They are hearing every note and nuance of sound very crisply. This makes for a nerve wracking experience since the sound is very exposed. This master player handled the challenge well and exploited the possibilities for the more intimate passages and subtle dynamics one might otherwise miss. Larry Snitzler appears by arrangement with: Lois Scott Management, Inc. (<http://www.performingarts.net/LSMI/snitzler.htm>)

Rico Stover at the Chevy Chase Community Center

John Rodgers produced this winner. Rico is a fabulous, powerful, high energy performer with a witty but brief and yet informative stage patter. His selections took the listener on a tour of South American classical music. The music and the show were based in classical and folk fundamentals, his playing a blend of those elements, sometimes rough like folk music where he brings forward the rhythmic elements (one cannot forget the importance of the element of dance) and smooth and polished for the appropriate passages. An entire show from memory pleased a good sized crowd as did a strong Baritone on a vocal selection.

From the outset, his playing represented a variety of countries and composers that showed off his considerable skill with different South American styles as he portrayed the state of playing in each region. He maintained variety with careful selection of pieces that ran the spectrum of classical, flamenco, and folk styles of playing and he took advantage of every dynamic and technical opportunity to thrill his audience. If ya missed this one, too bad. The waves were 25 feet high that night.

Chris Anderson

WGS April presentation brought the warm and engaging personality of Chris Anderson. His set offered a chance to hear a wonderful set of traditional classical guitar. Possessor of a noticeably beautiful tone, he produced every sweet sound out of a Tom Rodriguez guitar. A well selected variety from the standards and lesser known pieces as well as a rendition of the Ray Charles' classic, Georgia, pleased a good sized crowd. Masterful play from an animated performer who is a man of few words and plenty of guitar playing rounded out a great and entertaining evening. Of note to all the players out there, Chris tours. He follows the old rock and roll saying "if you build it, they will come." If you don't get it out there, no one will do it for you, and you have to have the stage time if your ever going to get this good.

Margarita Escarpa

From the Marlow Series, here was a chance to see and hear someone with so much talent. Recordings simply can't do justice to such great playing, one must see the live show. Polished, mellow, piano-like tones characterized equally polished playing through a set of elegant music. She lived up to every bit of her promise from the Series advertisement. This was a night for traditionalists. Except for a nod to Brouwer, the repertoire concentrated on Spanish greats like Torroba and Tedesco. She also offered her arrangements of a Rameau piano work. It matched perfectly with her other selections. Two standing ovations brought her back as the crowd paid her this well deserved compliment on outstanding playing.

Robinson HS Orchestra

Glenn McCarthy and the Robinson High School guitar orchestra were the opening act for Margarita Escarpa. Whether your area has such classes in their school or not, this show was a must see for fans of guitar. Eager faces concentrated on the able direction of Mr. McCarthy as they presented original arrangements. The 70 players were tight and well rehearsed and showed off just how effective the program for producing guitarists can be. Now one of several programs through out Virginia, Robinson's program was the pilot. With more than 25 years of experience, the Virginia guitar in public schools keeps class rooms full.

Coping with Music Performance Anxiety

This class was part of a lecture series at Shenandoah University in Winchester Virginia. There is much more to this subject than a quick fix. Julie Jaffe Nagel, a concert pianist with a Doctorate from Julliard in performance and a PhD in Psychology, presented an informative talk on a nasty subject. Still, we all deal with it in our business. So much so that she sees people for performance anxiety as her profession now in Illinois. And this career change came after successfully concretizing after dealing with her own fears. "I was a piano major with a minor in stage fright."

She covered every aspect from Beta blockers (get a Doctor's prescription please) to serious self examination with a qualified professional to advise you. Performance anxiety effects people in other situations than playing music. Public speaking can be just as anxiety ridden. She also mentioned several tricks, but warned that nothing beats taking the treatment of the anxiety seriously with a view of long term consequences and long term remedies.

The question answer period following her talk was equally revealing. Some from a full room of musicians bravely offered their experiences further re-enforcing her theme: "It's not easy, but you won't get anywhere if you don't try." This class was well worth the time whether helping oneself or others. We are not alone and there is hope.

WGS and how to improve the Society in general. I am looking for ways to increase attendance at our meetings and would welcome your feedback. For instance, are the meeting locations/times convenient? What about the content of the meetings? What are some suggestions that you feel would increase attendance / interest at our meetings? Personally, my own desire would be for the WGS to have the capability for searching a database for all members with their interests and contact info. This will aid in those wanting to contact others to get to know one another better. If you haven't done so already, please complete the membership application found on page two and be sure to fill out the section listing your interest/preferences. Regarding your feedback, I welcome either your e-mail or phone call.
